article, allowing you to access just that and not the whole newsletter. Of course, the search engine will now find not only the edition in which the chosen article was written, as I still have a file containing the complete newsletter as printed, but also individual files containing only that article. This method also allows me to remove all the advertisements, if they split an article in half.

Some may think that work is now complete, but I can guarantee that although it has been done with utmost care, there will always be a few errors, so the next step is to test that all the links work. I am glad to say that, although this could be done manually, with the aid of a program called Xenu Link Sleuth I am able to check automatically that every link points at least to an article. What can't be checked, though, is that they all point to and open the correct file. Although the menu from the search engine is accurate, links from my web based file menu will have to be checked manually, but I'll leave that to people using the disks and ask them to report back to me any anomalies found.

So, that's all it takes really. Oh, and, if I have created the disk correctly, adding one last file, it should open automatically when you put the disk into your computer, presenting you with the main menu in your chosen internet browser.

My moment of madness is now complete I reckon. It's now over to the committee to decide whether they want the entire disk's contents uploaded to their web site to be available to the world, or whether they wish to produce disks to be used without internet access for anyone who wishes to acquire a copy. This should work either way.
